Little Broadlands Team Takes Its Basketball Seriously

There are only seven men on the squad, and none of them are very big, but these Broadlands boys take their basketball seriously. Broadlands is always very interested in county basketball, largely due to the interest George Cook has generated since his coming as coach. Cook is one of the real veterans of the county.

Everyone was happy to see our last year's music teacher, Mrs. Cashe, who is substituting for Miss Bisson.

There is a rumor that the Freshmen are planning to entertain the student body and faculty at a party Friday night.

The rankings for the six weeks were as follows:

Seniors—1st, Helen Smith; 2nd, James Beatty; 3rd, Erna Klautsch; 4th, Decemma Martinie; 5th, Hazel Block.

Juniors — 1st, Lois Nonman; 2nd, Phyllis Toppe; 3rd, Rachel Davis.

Sophomores — 1st, Marcelle Nohren; 2nd, Glen Carleton.

Freshman—1st, Marjorie Hedrick; 2nd, Ralph Schweineke; 3rd, Fauneil Harden.

Neff Beats George

Official figures released after a recount of ballots in a contest for Sheriff of Vermilion County showed W. A. Neff, Republican, winner over sheriff Harry George, Democrat, by five votes.

Arguments over preservation and care of ballots are yet to be heard. Circuit-Judge John Gillan, Watseka, ruled out 1,400 contested ballots cast mainly by transient camp inmates and members of veterans national home here.

George, declared winner last November by 57 votes, indicated he will appeal to the state supreme court if the court holds that Neff was elected.

The Town Band

It is safe to say that no institution of a civic nature gives greater returns for the money and effort expended upon it than does a good town band. The benefits derived through the maintenance of a band touch the entire cultural, social and commercial life of the community.

Members of the organization are enabled to develop their musical talents in pleasant association with their fellows, while the discipline necessary to their successful advancement is most desirable.

After the band is capable of playing in public its presence adds immeasurably to parades, ceremonies and celebrations of every kind, while its regular concerts are a source of enjoyment for the entire citizenship.

As a business proposition, a band is of the greatest value in advertising its town. The better the band the better the advertisement, of course.

It does not take a large town to maintain a good band; in fact, some of the best amateur bands are found in towns of less than 1,000 population.

A town that does not possess a band is overlooking one of the most valuable agencies for its social and commercial advancement.

Community Suicide

One of the strangest phenomena witnessed in most towns and small cities is the apparent eagerness with which many otherwise good citizens contribute to the tendency to commit community suicide.

These citizens will often show uncommon zeal in boosting any movement to obtain city improvements, to promote the location of new industries, to secure better educational facilities, and so on. Yet many of these same proud boosters will deliberately engage in a practice which nullifies all their otherwise laudable efforts—and wonder why their town doesn't go ahead.

We refer to the suicidal habit of buying away from home. The enormous growth of the mail order habit in recent years is largely responsible for the failure of many communities to make the progress which their natural advantages should make possible. The money that ought to be kept at home for the expansion of local trade and industry is sent away to distant cities never to return. The life-blood of prosperity is allowed to ebb away through the indifference or thoughtlessness of the very persons who should set an example of local pride and loyalty.

A trifling saving here and there, usually more imaginary than real, is sufficient to cause the average citizen to forget his duty to his community and to himself, which if performed would mean far more in the direction of local prosperity than all his other boosting efforts put together.

Why boost in one direction, while committing community suicide in another.

Detective's Wife

By MARIE WEST

©, McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

UNDER the glare of the street light Sara saw the man's face as he passed her. The sight of it sent a paralyzing chill down her spine. For the last six months that face had been staring at her from the front pages of the Chicago newspapers. Foxy Fenton! Wanted for a string of bank robberies. Wanted for murder.

And for the last six months she'd been hearing that name over and over. Tim couldn't stop talking about him. That's what it meant being married to a detective.

Foxy Fenton! If only a polceman would appear! But that was hoping too much on a quiet street like this. And Tim wouldn't be coming home this way for another half-hour.

Instinctively she lengthened her stride. Perhaps it was being Tim's wife that made this feeling sweep through her, this urgent necessity to do something about it. She couldn't just let a criminal walk past her and disappear.

But, being a scant five feet of slim, inadequate strength, she shuddered. What she had suddenly decided to do would take all the courage she could summon.

She had nearly caught up with the man.

Stumbling off the curb she fell against him. It could easily have been accidental; the man steadied her an instant, a speculative gleam in his eyes.

"Thanks!" She withdrew her arm slowly, managed an arch smile.

"We seem to be goin' the same way," the man said finally, his voice casual.

"Yeah. . . . I live a block down the street. . . ."

A classy dame, he noted. Didn't look the type—yet you never could tell.

Hs grinned down at her. "And you're lonesome," he said. "Sure, so'm I, sister."

They climbed the two flights of stairs.

"Well, here we are." She made her voice gay. "How about a highball?"

"Now you're talking, baby. Make mine strong. Need any help?"

"No, thanks. I'll be right back."

It was relief to escape from him for a few minutes; a chance to get a firmer grip on herself. It wouldn't be for long. Just until Tim came. Tim would take care of him then. She squared her shoulders.

The man was sitting on the davenport when she returned. He took the glass she offered and patted the seat beside him. "Here's to you." He took a long gulp.

She sipped the plain ginger ale she had poured for herself. If she could just make him talk so he wouldn't touch her. She was afraid she might scream if he did that.

"How about some music," she suggested brightly going over to the radio.

"Get something peppy," he put in.

She took as long as she could. "How's this?" Rhythmic emerged from the loud speaker.

"Okay."

She saw that his glass was empty. "I'll get you another drink," she said.

Tim was late tonight. Tonight when she needed him so desperately!

She brought the drink into the living room. With one hand the man took it and with the other he drew her down beside him. She held her trembling lips together. Soon he would be trying to kiss her. Soon—

The key in the lock. At last! And big Tim standing there, his mouth agape.

"Oh Tim!" she cried.

The man jumped to his feet, his eyes narrow slits.

Tim stared at him. "As I breathe to live," he marveled, "I'd say you were Foxy Fenton, himself, if he hadn't been caught tonight."

"Caught?" Sara's voice was barely a whisper.

"Picked up in Nebraska. Late papers are full of it."

"Oh, I thought—" she began weakly.

"You thought I was Fenton?" the man roared. "And you were setting a trap. Ain't that a laugh?" He turned to Tim. "If you're the lady's husband, I'm sorry, pal. I didn't know she was married."

As the door closed upon him, Sara burst into hysterical tears.

"Tim," she gulped, "I saw him on the street. I wanted—"

"Sure, I know, Honey," he said gently. "You're a brave little thing." A glint of humor came into his blue eyes. "But you leave the detecting to me, Honey. It's too dangerous for a pint-sized infant like you."

Next morning as Sara lit the flame under the coffee pot, she heard the familiar thud as the morning paper hit the back door. She ran out to get it. Spreading it open, she gasped at the headlines:

FOXY FENTON SUSPECT FREED

Her eyes scanned the column. The man in Nebraska wasn't Fenton after all. Just a suspicious character who looked like him. The police were working on the latest tip-off that Fenton was hiding in Chicago.

"Tim," she called.

"What is it, Honey?"

"Look!"

Over the page their eyes met with the same question.

Jimmie—Dad, what's the stock exchange?

Dad—It's a place where ignorant people go to exchange a stock of money for a stock of experience.

Girl Friend—Yes, you remind me of the beautiful moon.

Boy Friend—What do you mean?

Girl Friend—Kinda bright but not so hot.

Mary—Did you have a good time last night?

Jane—Yeah, but take my advice and never slap a guy when he's chewing tobacco.

PWA Foreman—See here, buddy, that other fellow is carrying two sticks of timber when you are carrying only one. What have you got to say?

Buddy—That fellow's too lazy to go twice.

Superior Guy

GUSSIE's eyes roved over the dining room, appraising her fellow diners discontentedly. She hardly heard the harangue of her dinner partner.

"I'm getting fed up, see?" he snarled at her. "Y' can't even pick 'em any more."

"No?" she sneered, listlessly.

"No!" he sneered back. "Look at th' last twice. A shoe salesman without a dime, and then that tough cattle man who sez 'Go ahead and shoot.'"

"Can you beat that?" she exclaimed, nudging him excitedly. His gaze followed hers to a clean-cut young man, with a calm, detached air, then entering the room.

The new arrival coolly ignored the hat-check girl's arresting greeting, and left the waiter captain standing open-mouthed, as he deliberately wended his way among the tables and sat down at one near the orchestra.

"Oh, boy!" Gussie giggled, appreciatively. "Wish you had that kid's guts!"

An obsequious waiter was bending over the young man's table. His lips moved, but he straightened up with a hurt expression. The guest, his undivided attention on the menu-card, read off several items incisively, then turned his attention to a letter.

Gussie laughed aloud. "That's a bird I'd love ta get. Class, all over! Used to good things; servants don't scare him any."

"Aw, catfish!" jeered Joe. "Cut th' moonin', and get down t' bizness. Yeh couldn't even intrust a swell like him with a fan dance."

"Stick around, Joe," she advised, "we're going badger huntin' tonight."

Timing her exit with the stranger's, she followed him later into the lobby. Pausing before the locked door of the public stenographer's office, he glanced irritably at a small card on the door. "Back at 8:30. Leave name and room number on this pad." In a flash, Gussie was at his side, and with a possessive grip on the door-knob, turned to face him brightly.

"Had to come back for something," she lied, glibly. "Did you want me?"

Ah, the stenographer! He stared at her fixedly. "Are you permitted to come to guests' rooms? I have some letters . . ."

"Oh, yes," she assured him, with a quick nod. A brilliant thought flashed on her, and she reached for the pad. "Leave your name and room number, I—I have to check it."

"Oh, boy!" she gloated to Joe a minute later, gleefully exhibiting a stenographer's pad and pencil. "Now, we're all set. Gimme twenty minutes' start!"

"Are you nuts?" hissed Joe. "You're no—"

"Dumb cluck, you mean?" She smiled at him derisively. "Correct!"

The door to 808 was ajar, but Gussie rapped, demurely. The guest, John Burns, crossing the room with some collars, saw her in the doorway.

"Come in!" he invited, politely. "You are very prompt."

He waved her to a low easy chair. "Sit down here. You'll find it very comfortable." Leisurely, he drew up a larger arm-chair, between her and the door, facing her. Taking a sheaf of papers from his pocket, he said, matter-of-factly, "Take a letter!"

He paid little attention to her as he droned ahead. Better so. The meaningless curlicues on her pad might have given him quite a shock. As he finished, and turned his attention to a file at his elbow, Gussie rose, stretched herself senuously, and with pad in hand, perched on the arm of his chair. He glanced up with some surprise as one slender, silk-clad leg dangled uncomfortably close to him, and with elaborate carelessness, her arm stole around the back of his chair.

"So-o?" came a snarling voice at his back, "that's the way you double-cross me, hey?" Joe, with gun leveled, entered the room, closing the door carefully behind him. "Well, you big mutt, talk up. Whatcha doin' in here, with my wife?"

Burns was fumbling with his file, and Gussie, leaning closer, threw both arms around him convulsively, meanwhile eyeing the newcomer with convincing terror. Quite slowly and deliberately, and showing pained surprise, he disentangled himself from her embrace, wriggled out of his chair, and his gaze met that of the "outraged husband."

"What are you doing in here?" he demanded, ominously. "Get out!"

"Well, I'll be d—d!" screeched Joe, hysterically, and flourishing his gun threateningly. "It's gonna cost you plenty, see? And I ain't goin' until—"

Burns, with one rapid leap, brought his open hand to the rat's face with a resounding slap, sending him reeling. Following up the slap, he grabbed the gun, thrust it into his own pocket, and, then, grasping Joe firmly by the scruff of his neck, dragged him to the door, and hurled him into the hall. Dusting his hands contemptuously, he closed the door and turned to face the now truly terrified girl.

"Sorry you had to witness that," he told her, apologetically. "But I certainly owe you a debt of gratitude." She stared at him. "Sure was game of you, throwing your arms around me to protect me from that hold-up man. But, then, I wasn't afraid of him."

"And—and you're not sore at me?" gasped Gussie, eyeing him half in admiration, half in stark disbelief. "You—you're not gonna turn me in?" She trembled, violently.

"How much do I owe you?" he asked, seemingly ignoring her questions good-naturedly. "Here," he fumbled with her writing pad, "write it down here. You see," he smiled wistfully, "I'm totally deaf."
