Galesburg Unit Of U. I. Termed Unique Campus

"A University unique in the history of education." Such is the phrase used to describe the University of Illinois Undergraduate Division at Galesburg by President George D. Stoddard.

The 160-acre Galesburg campus, formerly the army's Mayo General Hospital, is one of the most unusual in the world. Remodeled for use by the University, it comprises 117 permanent brick buildings connected by covered, heated corridors. With facilities for 2,000 students, it has openings for housing and teaching 1,500 newcomers in February.

The facility was declared surplus by the army and turned over to the State of Illinois late last fall. Governor Dwight H. Green assigned it temporarily to the University in response to the request by President Stoddard and Park Livingston, president of the University board of trustees.

The two officials pointed out that the Urbana-Champaign campus and Navy Pier in Chicago would not be adequate for the unprecedented demands for higher education, mostly by veterans. Transfer of the hospital to the University was made on Sept. 21 and classes begun exactly one month later, on Oct. 21. Dean Frederic R. Hamilton was called upon to establish a complete and co-ordinated unit of undergraduate study in 30 days. Actually it was less than that, since Dean Hamilton did not receive his unusual assignment until Oct. 1. It was the "work according to schedule" of University physical plant engineers plus the accomplishments of administrative personnel and faculty which prompted University officials here to acclaim the Galesburg Division as "one of the most rapidly developed universities in the history of education." The physical facilities proved ideal for establishing a University and provided Illinois with "the top spot in the nation, when other institutions are overcrowded and turning students away," said Dean Hamilton.

He looked at his watch and his jaw set in a determined line -four miles yet to the next stop. The pain shot through his knee again and sweat stood out on his forehead. He slowed his walk and set his foot more carefully each

It was then he saw the car parked beside the concrete road at the foot of the hill. Now he would get a ride have? if the driver didn't leave before he got there-the car was headed the other way. He tried to walk faster, then slowed down, the man was sitting on the fender, a big man, a fat man, as still as an Indian in the sun. "Hi young fellow," he called when and took a taxi. The driver warned us the bus might not get in." Hollis forced his voice under control. "How did you come to stick with it?" He leaned forward and his eyes lost their mildness. "I'm interested in this line for one thing," Hollis' words came slowly, "and-my finances don't run to big taxi bills."

"What's your hurry to get to the next town, young fellow?"

HOLLIS settled himself again resignedly and pushed an ant off his sore knee with a blade of grass. "I'm going to meet a man connected with this bus line, and-" he stuck out his chin and his voice was hard as nails, "tell him what's wrong with it."

"Such as?" The fat man leaned forward eagerly.

"This-" Hollis made a wild gesture, 'Sit on the road two hours waiting- just waiting-" He forgot he was talking to a meddlesome stranger and it all came pouring out. There would be a communication system like in the army, with lus Avellana is the botanical term the exact location of buses charted on maps at frequent intervals, someone to be there quickly in time of trouble. Bus travel in the future must be dependable; the fixtures to be comfortable and durable, nothing elaborate.

"People who want luxuries use their own cars, or ride trains or planes-it's the common people who need buses," Hollis finished out of breath.

Another car came roaring over the hill. Hollis stood up and stuck his foot out a time or two to test it before he stepped toward the car. The driver slackened his speed and waved at the man on the fender as he went by.

The fat man laughed. Hollis whirled on him with a white face. "So-it's funny, is it?" The big man looked at his watch. "Guess you're the only one impatient to get to where he's going."

Hollis watched with a grin of relief as the fat man in one easy motion shifted his huge bulk to a standing position and put out his resistance. hand to open the door.

Emergency.

Here is how the University of Illinois in the fall of 1946 met the unprecedented demands for education First Spook-What's that bump | placed upon it by 28,553 veterans and others who flocked to it.

Its peak pre-war enrollment in the fall of 1938 was 12,631 at Urbana-Champaign, 1,242 in the Colleges of Medicine, Dentistry, and Pharmacy at Chicago, and 270 extra-mural stu-

University authorities moved swiftthat all previous enrollments would be dwarfed. At Urbana-Champaign, And the University converted into dormitories the Gymnasium Annex, Ice Rink, and space under Memorial Stadium, brought in temporary housing facilities, and campaigned for more student rooms in local homes. It estimated that probably 14,000 could be accommodated. But actual enrollment at Urbana was Additional teachers were found and classes were put on a schedule from 7 a. m. to 10 p. m. including noon and evening meal hours. On its medical campus in Chicago enrollment went to 1,505.

The facilities at Urbana-Champaign were far from enough to meet the need. Three more steps were taken.

Arranged with 31 Illinois high schools to utilize their facilities, including staff members, for freshman courses to be presented in the late afternoon and in the evenings. Enrollment was 3,115.

In Chicago, it took over a large part of Navy Pier and converted it into an undergraduate division of the University where 3,846 enrolled.

With the demand still continuing, the University also took over the extensive plant of a former Army general hospital at Galesburg for another undergraduate division to teach and house 2,000.
